DAVY CREW CUT

"You must never venture far from home, my son," Big Hoot warned Little Hoot. "There are many dangers in the forest for an owl who is too young to fly."

"But, Papa," protested Little Hoot, "if I am ever to be as wise as you are, I must go out and see the world for myself."

"There will be plenty of time for that when you get older," smiled Big Hoot.

Sadly, Little Hoot walked into the woods to think over what his father had said.

"I'm pretty wise now," thought Little Hoot, "but I'm still not QUITE as smart as my father. If I could only see the world I would be just as smart."

Little Hoot continued walking in the forest and thinking to himself. He remembered his father's warning of the dangers in the forest, but the forest looked quiet and safe to him.

"I'm not afraid of anything in this forest," bragged Little Hoot to himself. "I'm Little Hoot, and I don't give a hoot about any danger. I'm pretty wise, I think."

He had almost convinced himself that it was safe to go out on his own to see the world, when he realized that it was almost nightfall.

"I'll go home now," thought Little Hoot, "and tomorrow, when it's light, I'll start out to see the world."

He turned to the left, then he turned to the right; and suddenly he realized that he did not know which way home was. Darkness closed in fast, and he was lost.

"Gee," exclaimed Little Hoot, "for being so smart, how could I be so dumb? The forest is so different and strange at night, but I'm not scared, I'll find my way."

Little Hoot tried to decide which way was the right way, but the further he walked the more confused he became.

"Oh, my! I should have listened to my father," he sighed. "I should not have wandered so far from home."

"Grrr!" came a deep-throated growl from behind Little Hoot.

Little Hoot quickly jumped into a bush. Quietly, he peeped from the bush to see what had made the frightful noise. A big gray wolf was standing close by.

"I know you are in that bush," the big wolf growled again. "Your knees are shaking with fright, and you are so scared that you are making the whole bush shake, too."

The wolf was right, Little Hoot was very afraid, but he knew that he could not stay in the bush all night, so he ran. The wolf was close on his heels. Suddenly, Little Hoot felt himself being lifted into the air, and not by the wolf, but by his father.

"Why, this tree is our home!" exclaimed Little Hoot, as his father gently dropped him on the limb of the tree.

"That's right," hooted Big Hoot. "While you were lost, you were never very far from home. You were walking around in circles, and I was watching you."

"Whew! And am I glad! I never realized how easy it is to become lost in the woods," sighed Little Hoot, "and I didn't know that mean wolves came out at night, either."

"You are still a little owl, and you can see the world when you are older," scolded Big Hoot. "I hope this venture has taught you a lesson, son."

"It has," hooted Little Hoot. "I know I can become just as wise by learning from you as I can by going out and seeing the world on my own... and it's a lot SAFER!"
